

FREQUENTLY ASKED QUESTIONS: STATE OR FEDERAL?

Q: What's the difference between state and federal courts?

A: There are 51 state and federal court systems in the United States: one federal court system, and 50 state court systems (each of the 50 states has its own court system). Each system operates independently of the other one, and reforms to one system do not translate to the others. For example, if the Massachusetts legislature passes a law repealing its mandatory minimum laws, those reforms only apply to cases in the Massachusetts system, not to cases in the federal system or in other state systems. Similarly, if the U.S. Congress passes a law reforming mandatory minimums, that reform would apply only to the federal system and not to any state systems.

- State court systems handle violations of state (not federal) laws. The court system is usually broken down into county or district trial courts, an appellate court, and a state Supreme Court. For an example, look at Oregon's map of its district courts: <http://www.ojd.state.or.us/aboutus/courtsintro/judicialdistricts.htm>.
- The federal court system handles violations of federal (not state) laws. The federal court system is nation-wide and is made up of 94 district courts (there is at least one federal district court in each state), 11 appellate courts, and the U.S. Supreme Court. You can learn more about federal courts at <http://www.uscourts.gov/about.html>.

Q: How do I know which court I or my loved one is being prosecuted in?

A: There are several ways to get this information:

- Call your or your loved one's attorney and ask. (Always do this first!)
- Call the courthouse where you and your loved one have been ordered to make an appearance. Ask to speak with the clerk of court, and then ask whether your or your loved one's case is in federal or state court.
- Look at the first page of any document filed in your or your loved one's case (i.e., the indictment, a legal brief). If the top of the page says "U.S. District Court," the case is being prosecuted in federal court. If the top of the page says something else (i.e., "Hennepin County District Court"), the case is being prosecuted in a state court.
- Look at the indictment or complaint that lists the offenses you or your loved one is being charged with. Federal charges can only be prosecuted in federal courts. State charges can only be prosecuted in state courts.
 - The charges will include a citation to a law. Federal laws are always written as ___ U.S.C. § ___ (for example, 21 U.S.C. § 841). State laws are written differently and will not include the letters "U.S.C." in the citation.
 - Example: An indictment describes one of the charges as follows: "Conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute more than 50 grams of cocaine base, a violation of 21 U.S.C. § 841(b)." Just from the way the law citation is written (21 U.S.C. § 841(b)), you know that this is a federal charge. Therefore, the case is being handled in federal court.

Q: Which crimes are prosecuted in federal court, and which are prosecuted in state court?

A: Both the federal and state court systems hear and sentence criminal cases:

- State courts have the power to prosecute anything that the laws in that state say is a crime, as long as the crime occurred in the state or the state otherwise has jurisdiction over the crime. Almost all violent, sex, and property crimes (i.e., murder, rape, armed robbery, burglary, theft) are handled by state courts.
- Federal courts have the power to prosecute anything that federal law says is a crime. However, the Constitution generally limits the federal government to prosecuting a smaller group of crimes than states can prosecute. Federal courts most frequently handle drug, gun, immigration, terrorism, bank robbery, child pornography, identity theft, organized crime, piracy, and white collar offenses.
- Some crimes (i.e., immigration offenses) can usually only be prosecuted in federal court.
- Some crimes (including gun, drug, identity theft, child pornography, white collar, and bank robbery offenses) can be prosecuted in both state and federal courts.

Q: Who decides whether a crime will be prosecuted in federal court or in state court?

A: For those crimes that can be prosecuted in both federal and state courts (e.g., drug and gun offenses), it is up to the state and federal prosecutors to decide which court will handle each case. In rare cases, a person will be charged, convicted, and sentenced for the same crime in both state and federal courts – in this situation, there will be two separate court proceedings (one in state court and one in federal court) for the same crime. Again, choosing to prosecute a case this way is entirely up to the state and federal prosecutors.

Q: If Congress passes a new law that changes sentences, will it impact my or my loved one's sentence?

A: Only if you or your loved one were convicted and sentenced in federal court! Remember:

- Congress can only change federal sentencing laws, not state sentencing laws.
- It is up to the state's legislature to change its own state's sentencing laws. State legislatures cannot change federal sentencing laws.
- If you or a loved one were sentenced in a state court, only changes to the sentencing laws in the state where you were convicted can potentially benefit you.
- If you or a loved one were sentenced in federal court, only changes to federal sentencing laws can potentially benefit you.
- Changes to sentencing laws do not apply to people who were sentenced before the date those changes were passed, unless the changes are made retroactive. Not all new laws are made retroactive.

Q: How can I help FAMM change federal and state sentencing laws?

A: Learn more by visiting www.famm.org. Tell your friends and family about FAMM. Use our Citizen Action Kit (available at our website) to urge your legislators to reform sentencing laws. Finally, donate to our work so we can continue fighting for a fairer sentencing system!
